Introduction

What do today's elites think about global governance? How far do leaders in contemporary politics and society think globally and look to global institutions to tackle global problems? How much confidence do elites have in existing global governance arrangements, such as the Group of Twenty (G20) and the United Nations (UN)? What criteria do elites prioritize when they evaluate global governance institutions? Which legitimization and delegitimizing strategies do elites use toward global governance institutions? And which audiences do they target? To what extent are elites' attitudes about global governance institutions different from those of publics at large?

These issues at the core of the Legitimacy in Global Governance (LegGov) research program are important. Today's world has become increasingly global. Society faces major planet-spanning challenges, for example, around digital networks, ecological changes, finance capital, migration, peacebuilding, transborder diseases, and much more. Yet are society's leaders - and societies at large - ready and willing to tackle global problems with global governance? Moreover, what kind of global governance do they have in mind?

Whether global governance happens - to what extents, on what terms, and with what impacts - depends substantially on the attitudes of elites. Both for politics in general and for global politics in particular, society's elites take the lead in setting agendas, constructing institutions, taking and implementing decisions, and assessing policy outcomes. Hence knowing what elites think about global governance can suggest what kinds of global futures are in prospect, as well as what might need to change in order to shift course. Moreover, comparing the views of elites with those of broader populations can reveal a (mis)match between the two.

To study elite attitudes toward global governance, the LegGov research program at the Universities of Stockholm, Lund, and Gothenburg has conducted a major survey (to be referred to as the LegGov Elite Survey) of leaders in government, political parties, business, civil society, media, and research. Between October 2017 and August 2019, we interviewed 860 leaders spread across six diverse countries (Brazil, Germany, Philippines, Russia, South Africa, and USA) and a transnational elite group working in global organizations.

To allow for a comparison of elite attitudes with those of broader publics, a unique coordination was set up with Wave 7 of the World Values Survey (WVS 7). We inserted a battery of questions on global governance institutions into WVS 7 and included identical questions in the LegGov Elite survey. The timing of both surveys was coordinated so that the overall field phases encompassed the same time span.

In sum, the LegGov Elite Survey delivers data that makes it possible to study a broad variety of aspects of elite attitudes and reported behavior toward global governance in an ambitious comparative design that covers multiple global governance institutions, countries (and a transnational elite group), and elite sectors (business, civil society, government bureaucracy, media, party politics, and research). The coordination with the WVS 7 allows for an unprecedented systematic comparison of public and elite attitudes toward global governance in multiple countries.

This report presents full technical details of the survey, including the construction of the questionnaire, the applied sampling procedure, contacting procedure, and survey administration. The full questionnaire in four languages (German, English, Portuguese and Russian) is attached at the end of the report. At the end of 2021, the dataset will be publicly released and available at <https://www.statsvet.su.se/leggov/leggov-elite-survey>.

Acknowledgements

We begin by thanking the 860 participants in this survey. Without their generous contributions, creating this dataset would not have been possible.

We also thank all colleagues from the Legitimacy in Global Governance program for their valuable input and feedback on the questionnaire.

Execution of the elite survey has also depended substantially on fruitful collaborations with in-country partners who advised on the national samples and/or conducted the interviews. In Brazil we partnered with a team at the State University of Rio de Janeiro (UERJ), comprised of José Mauricio Domingues, Gabriela Caruso, Magno Klein, and Fabricio Mello. To identify and reach elites in the Philippines we benefited greatly from the advice of Bonn Juego. In Russia we collaborated with researchers at the Institute of International Relations and World Economy (IMEMO) in Moscow, including Alexey Kuznetsov, Pavel Timofeev, Eduard Ipatov, Marina Ipatova, and Maria Khorolskaya. In South Africa we cooperated with the Institute for Strategic and Political Affairs (ISPA) at the University of Pretoria, in particular Siphamandla Zondi, Gabila Nubong, Marlie Holtzhausen, Erica Cerejo, Sumien Deetlefs, Sylvia Graham, Edwin Hlase, Nomzamo Malindisa, Mellissa Mlambo, and Ashleigh Shangare. The survey platform CivicPulse, under the coordination of Nathan Lee, helped to collect responses from state-level political representatives in the United States. We are grateful to all of our partners, while also underlining that they have had no influence over survey responses and bear no responsibility for the data analysis.

Research assistants at Stockholm University completed the interviews for Germany, the Philippines, most of the USA sample, and the global elite sample. For this major work we are thankful to Dennis Besseling, Melika Bouhel, Benjamin Darrah-Morgan, Monique Dugarte, Maria Hornung, Riti Joshi, Charlotta Lidström, Ricarda Richter, Waris Sabah, Georgios Sideras, Ana Sofia Valderas, Paulina Cruz Velasquez, and Dionys Zink. Soetkin Verhaegen coordinated the LegGov Elite Survey.

Last and by no means least we are grateful for generous funding of the elite survey project, within our larger LegGov program, from Riksbankens Jubileumsfond (the Bank of Sweden Tercentenary Foundation), grant number M15-0048:1.

1. Designing the questionnaire

The questionnaire of the LegGov Elite Survey contains questions that are identical to those asked in the World Values Survey Wave 7 (WVS 7), as well as original questions developed for the purpose of the LegGov research program.

The questionnaire consists of 35 (grouped) questions (see section 5). It starts with a few easily digestible questions on respondents' interest in global, regional, national, and local politics, and on where they get their information about politics. Next, the survey asks respondents about their attitudes, preferences, evaluations and experience regarding global and regional governance institutions. Questions probe respondents' confidence in these institutions, their preferences and evaluations regarding qualities of global governance institutions (in particular democracy, effectiveness and fairness). Further questions examine perceived influence of one's country in global and regional governance institutions, perceived benefits of one's country from global and regional governance institutions, and experience of and engagement with global governance institutions. The questionnaire then considers respondents' perceptions of citizens' views on global, regional and national governance institutions. Finally, the survey asks respondents about their political and societal values and attitudes (including left-right position, social trust, attitudes about migration, and views on a range of ethical issues), evaluations of the political and economic situation in their country, and a few socio-demographics (gender, age, citizenship, education, and religion).

The global governance institutions covered in the questionnaire include intergovernmental organizations, transgovernmental networks, and private institutions. The fourteen specific institutions are: the International Federation of Association Football (FIFA), the Forest Stewardship Council (FSC), the Group of Twenty (G20), the Internet Corporation for Assigned Names and Numbers (ICANN), the International Criminal Court (ICC), the International Monetary Fund (IMF), the Kimberley Process (KP), the North Atlantic Treaty Organization (NATO), the United Nations (UN), the United Nations Framework Convention on Climate Change (UNFCCC), the United Nations Security Council (UNSC), the World Health Organization (WHO), the World Bank, and the World Trade Organization (WTO). We can group these institutions as being active in three broad policy fields of economy, security, and sustainable development.

The questionnaire was first prepared in English, for use in the Philippines, South Africa, USA, and global sample. We also made translations into Portuguese for Brazil, German for Germany and Russian for Russia. For questions that also appear in WVS 7, we used the verbatim WVS translation, in order to enable direct comparisons between data from the two surveys. The elite survey questions were translated independently by two native speakers and then compared. Differences in translation were evaluated in comparison with the English original with the aim to achieve the maximally similar meaning as possible across languages. The complete questionnaire in the four languages is available at the end of this report.

2. Sampling procedure

2.1. Defining elites

The study defines elites as ‘people who hold leading positions in key organizations in society that strive to be politically influential’. Hence the survey includes not only ‘political elites’ (i.e. in government bureaucracies and political parties), but also ‘societal elites’ (i.e. in business, civil society, media and research). Moreover, we cover not only specialists in global governance, but also political and societal leaders more generally. The study assumes that attitudes in these elite circles can have significant implications for the place of global governance institutions in today’s world.

2.2. Quota sampling

The LegGov Elite Survey has taken a quota sample of political and societal elites in six countries, and a ‘global sample’. Quota sampling is uniquely suitable for ensuring that respondents cover a wide variety of positions and contexts when no exhaustive database is available for drawing a random sample (more on the selection criteria in section 2.3.). However, in contrast to a random sample, quota sampling does not permit extrapolation of survey results beyond the sample.

Figure 1 and Table 1 present an overview of the geographical subsamples and elite sectors within these subsamples. The figure also indicates the quota of interviews to be completed within each sector. At least 100 interviews had to be conducted in each country and in the global sample, adding up to 700 interviews.<sup>1</sup> Within each subsample, half of the respondents were set to be political elites (25 each for bureaucracy and party politics) and the other half societal elites (12-13 each for business, civil society, media, and research). In the global sample, political elites consist of national representatives at global governance institutions and permanent officials of global governance institutions.

Within the target population of people in leading positions, a distinction can be made between people at the head of organizations and people in other senior positions. As shown in Table 2, the sample consists of people in both types of functions. People in the high-level positions were prioritized as they can be regarded as most influential.

We arrived at the requisite number of respondents in each subsample by using “hard quota” (i.e. the minimum number of respondents of each sector) and “soft quota” (i.e. diversity in terms of seniority, level of position, orientation, and issue areas). Tables 1 and 2 show the coverage of the final sample in terms of the hard quota, and level of seniority. Section 2.3. provides more information on diversity in terms of level of position, orientation and issue area.

<sup>1</sup> The final sample sizes, as presented in Table 1, are about 20% higher, with 860 respondents in total. This results from simultaneous invitations to interview. Oversampling occurred when more than the minimum required number of people agreed to take the survey. Some oversampling is useful to retain statistical power, given that some respondents do not answer all of the survey questions.

The overall response rate was 31.8 percent, ranging from a low of 22.0 percent in Russia to a high of 56.2 percent in the Philippines (see Table 3). Response rates do not inform about representativeness in the context of quota sampling. However, we record them as an indicator of the practicability of the elite survey. The relatively high response rates for this type of study shows the considerable interest in our study among the approached elites.<sup>2</sup>

2.3. Selecting the respondents

2.3.1. Geographical subsamples

As a first step, we selected seven geographical sites from which to invite the elite survey participants. The six focal countries (Brazil, Germany, Philippines, Russia, South Africa, and USA) cover a range of different positions in world affairs: culturally, economically, geographically, and politically. We added a further ‘global sample’ of elites who are attached to global civil society organizations, global corporations, global media outlets, global research institutes, and global governance institutions themselves.

2.3.2. Organizations

Next, we employed a targeted selection procedure using the positional method as described by Hoffmann-Lange<sup>3</sup> to identify the most relevant people to interview in each geographical subsample. Here we first identified key organizations in society for each of the six countries of the survey as well as the global arena. These lists of organizations covered the six sectors of interest: business, civil society, government bureaucracy, media, party politics, and research. In selecting specific organizations, we drew inter alia upon in-house LegGov expertise and previous work (e.g. Tallberg et al., 2013), generous assistance from scholars specialized in the various countries, participation and accreditation lists for the global governance institutions that are central to our study, and statistics on audience size for media organizations.

2.3.3. Individuals

The second step in the positional method is to identify relevant people in leading positions within the selected organizations. People with a coordinating or strategic function, and working on substantive issues within their organization, were eligible for the study (so excluding pure administrative management). For example, in the party-political category we interviewed elected politicians or their senior advisors. In government bureaucracies, we invited senior figures in the civil service, the diplomatic corps, the judiciary, and the military. In business circles, we interviewed company managers, international relations officers, and senior communication staff. For civil society organizations, we addressed directors, strategic advisors and leading activists. In the media arena, we approached editors and senior journalists. In the research category, we included professors and senior researchers at universities and think tanks. At the global governance institutions themselves, we interviewed leading international civil servants as well as state representatives and their senior advisors (e.g. ambassadors, heads of delegations or negotiators).

We also strived to include a diverse set of respondents in terms of: the level of their position (subnational, national or international) (Table 4); the main orientation of their day-to-day work (subnational, national or international) (Table 5); and the issues they mainly handle, as linked to economy, security, and sustainable development (Table 6). Specifically for respondents from political parties, we paid due attention to the proportion of seats of each party in the national legislature. The samples cover a broad diversity of political views, but include more interviews with politicians from the largest parties. We discuss the details of the resulting diversity of the samples in what follows.

Our sampling strategy ensured that we obtained a sample of elites that is not limited to individuals working on global issues, but also includes elites who work exclusively with domestic political issues. Table 4 illustrates the diversity of the sample in terms of including people in both (sub)national and international-level positions. Table 5 indicates that more than half of the respondents overall are (sub)nationally oriented in their work. For example, the sample is not limited to parliamentarians who are part of the Foreign Affairs committee, or journalists working at the international division of their news outlet. In the global sample, all respondents are considered to be internationally oriented, but national representatives at global governance institutions, and people at national offices of a global organization, are categorized as holding a national-level position.

The inclusion of internationally oriented organizations and elites in both the global and the country samples raises the question of the demarcation between organizations that qualify for the global sample and those that qualify for the country samples. We based this demarcation on the location of the main office(s) of an organization or institution. A philanthropic foundation based in the USA providing development aid to countries in the Global South, for instance, would be regarded as part of the USA civil society sample. A similar organization with branches in multiple countries would be categorized as part of the global sample. Similarly, the global news branch of a public broadcast with a broad base of reporters around the world would qualify for the global media sample, while a nationally oriented newspaper in the Philippines would be part of the Philippines sample, even though the newspaper also reports on international issues.

In Table 6, we illustrate the diversity of the sample in terms of the main issue area in which the respondents worked. We have sought to reach diversity across the three broad issue areas covered by the global governance institutions in the survey: namely, economy, security, and sustainable development. We also targeted a fourth category of generalists. Taken together, this strategy allows for investigations of issue-specific dynamics.

3. The interviews

3.1. Contacting procedure and timeline

We used a standardized contacting procedure. We first sent the selected people an invitation for an interview by email.<sup>4</sup> This invitation included information on the purpose of the study, the way in which data would be handled (anonymity and confidence), and the practicalities of the interview (i.e. by telephone). Direct email addresses were used when we could find them online. In other cases, we used a more general email address of the invited person's organization. Alternatively, we called or emailed the organization to inquire about the person's contact details. We sent the first interview invitations in October 2017. The last interview took place in early August 2019. Figure 2 presents the start and end dates of the fieldwork in each geographical subsample.

If we received no response to an email invitation after a week, we made a follow-up telephone call to inquire about availability for an interview. When telephone numbers were not available, we followed up through email. Where these attempts were also unsuccessful, we followed up by another email reminder, again stating the relevance of the research and particularly the importance of participation for the quality of our research. After this reminder, we followed up again by calling the office of the person we wanted to interview. In cases where these procedures resulted in neither participation, nor decline, we sent up to two more email reminders, this time offering a link to an online survey<sup>5</sup> that contained exactly the same questionnaire as the telephone survey.

<sup>4</sup> The contacting procedure we used is based on Dillman, Don A., Jolene D. Smyth and Leah Melani Christian. (2014). Internet, Phone, Mail, and Mixed-Mode Surveys: The Tailored Design Method, 4th Edition. Hoboken, NJ, US: John Wiley & Sons Inc., with adaptations made to tailor the method to our specific target group (elites, in contrast to the general public).

One exception to this procedure was our cooperation with CivicPulse to obtain 20 interviews with state-level legislators and senior staff in the USA. In this case, online survey requests were emailed to participants in the CivicPulse panel. Respondents were not contacted by telephone. Furthermore, those 20 respondents received a shortened version of the questionnaire, given the CivicPulse format of online surveys that take no longer than 10 minutes to complete. This measure accounts for gaps in the dataset with respect to the excluded variables.

<sup>5</sup> In the Russian sample, an offline version of the survey was attached to the reminder together with the online link. Respondents could complete this offline survey and return it by email or post. The questionnaire in this document was identical to the one used online and in telephone interviews.

3.2. Survey mode

Our preferred survey mode by telephone offers multiple benefits. First, it allowed us to verify whether the intended person takes the survey (and not an assistant, for instance). Second, it enabled us to record the level of interest and concentration of the respondent during the interview as an indication of the quality of the data.<sup>6</sup> Third, survey by telephone allowed the interviewer to provide standard clarifications should questions come up during the interview.

In cases where we could not get access to a telephone number of invited respondents, we sent a link to the online version of the survey. We also provided this option if the respondent requested it. Time was the main reason for such requests, as it takes less time to complete the survey online than over the phone. In these cases, we clearly communicated that we had specifically invited the respondent for the interview (and not an assistant, for instance) and we added a relevant control question at the end of the online survey. Of the total sample, 81.5% of the interviews were done by telephone and 18.5% online (including the 20 interviews through CivicPulse). The questions and response options in both survey modes were identical, only the CivicPulse survey was shorter.

3.3. The choice for closed-ended survey questions

The choice for a standardized questionnaire rather than qualitative interviews when studying elites requires some additional reflection. As previous studies have noted (e.g. Aberbach et al. 1975), people in leading positions are generally less inclined to participate in surveys. Some interviewees struggled with the standardized approach, which did not allow them to elaborate on their thinking about the issues in question. However, respondents were asked to elaborate their understanding of ‘confidence’ in governance institutions, as a central concept in our study.

We opted for standardized questionnaires in order to be able to systematically compare elite attitudes toward global governance across countries, across elite sectors, and across global governance institutions, as well as to compare elite attitudes to those of publics at large. Therefore, the comparability of answers to specific questions took priority over capturing more individualized accounts about global governance.

3.4. Truthfulness of the interviewees

The truthfulness of interviewees is an important question for all types of interviewees in any study, but it is a particular concern when respondents’ function implies high levels of public visibility. To limit this potential issue, we stressed in all of our communications the confidentiality and anonymity of the interviews. We underlined that all personal data would be removed at the end of the fieldwork period, that we would only perform large-scale analyses with the data (instead of reporting the responses of individual respondents), and that the use of standardized response options would also contribute to anonymity. After completing a telephone interview, the interviewer reported their impression of whether the respondent was alone when taking the interview and whether they felt that the respondent spoke freely during the interview. In more than 90 per cent of the cases the respondent seemed to be in a situation where the conversation could not be overheard. The impression among interviewers that respondents spoke freely was even greater.

<sup>6</sup> According to interviewer evaluations, 60.7% of the respondents showed great interest while taking the survey, 35.7% was somewhat interested, and 3.5% did not seem interested.

Befragung über internationale Themen – Legitimität in Global Governance (LegGov)
Forschungsprogramm

Sehr geehrte Damen und Herren,

vielen Dank, dass Sie an unserer Studie teilnehmen! Wir hatten Sie ja bereits kontaktiert und Ihnen bei dieser Gelegenheit mitgeteilt, dass wir eine Studie durchführen, die die Einstellungen von Menschen, die in verschiedenen politischen und gesellschaftlichen Bereichen tätig sind, gegenüber internationaler Politik untersucht.
Wir haben Sie aufgrund der Organisation, für die Sie arbeiten, sowie Ihrer Tätigkeit in dieser Organisation ausgesucht.

Die Fragen in diesem Fragebogen berühren eine Reihe verschiedener Themen. Wir sind an Ihrer persönlichen Meinung interessiert, es gibt also keine richtigen oder falschen Antworten. Ihre Antworten werden anonymisiert und strikt vertraulich behandeln. Ihre Angaben werden zu einem besseren Verständnis darüber beitragen, wie Menschen in Organisationen wie der Ihren internationale Politik sehen und formen. Das Ausfüllen des Fragebogens dauert ungefähr 15 Minuten.

Eu vou começar lendo a introdução no survey:

Como mencionado quando o(a) Senhor(a) foi contatado(a) anteriormente, estamos realizando um estudo sobre o que as pessoas em posições de liderança pensam sobre a política internacional. O(a) Senhor(a) foi selecionado(a) com base na organização para a qual trabalha e em sua posição nessa organização.
